Siege and Destroy is a sandbox game with a cinematic visual look and action combat experience. Set in post-apocalyptic northern Norway in the year 2088, a band of mercenaries is hired to protect the populace from a mysterious trouble. Your mission is to guide our heroes and build your team of mercenaries in a free and competitive game world. Build housing facilities, parks, sport fields and military garrisons to improve team morale and earn the trust of your clients. Join the revolution or create your own! Be inspired by the political system to reach your goals. Key Features: - Tactical gameplay - Realistic damage system - Create your own mercenary or hire the services of other players - Vote system - Fast and intuitive gameplay - Minimal HUD - Storyline and crafting system with ARPG elements - Orchestral soundtrackQ: Sourcing configuration in ansible I have a yaml file (exec.yml) from which I'm trying to source some properties in an ansible playbook (main.yml). exec.yml is at the same directory as main.yml and I am trying to source it with: - include: main.yml with_fileglob: - "*" .yml" I get: fatal: [ppc1]: FAILED! => {"changed": true, "msg": "Invalid path ['ppc1'] for include_vars"} What is the correct way to source ansible yaml files? A: You could try this, this will not check that file exists it only uses the name the file was invoked with: - name: Include config include_vars: file: "{{ ansible_cfg_file }}" A: Actually, this is no longer a bug since 2.6.1. The execution of include_vars in your example will fail because you're only passing the name of the file to include. If you also want to check for the existence of the file use this approach: - name: Include config include_vars: only: /home/user/.ansible/cp/includes/main.yml register: include_vars If you just want to check the content of the file use: - name: Include config d41b202975

Added 4 year(s) ago by barbrajamisonrob, 8 comment(s) Part I "Never mind, Apollo," Steve muttered, putting a glue pot in the back of the shop. Yeah, he thought. The trip there hadn't been pleasant, to be perfectly honest. If it had been me, I wouldn't have taken the time, though. Robert was a citizen of Corinth, so getting to him had been simple, and I'd gotten hold of the subject quickly enough. After the training session, everyone had gone home to have their fun with their families, but Steve still wasn't over the shock of his newest student. Doing them closer to home, though, had meant Robert could actually take time away to school Steve on what he knew on his own. Unfortunately, it took the better part of an hour to get home in time, too. I didn't really need anything from the citizens of Corinth, or even the engineers from Pylos and Iolkos, who tended to be absent if they lived far from home. A lonely place, home. The fact that I hadn't had to seek out his help even once during our journey eased it for Steve, though. He remembered how often the Goddess had chosen to use him to do her bidding in the past, though, so he wasn't completely surprised when she'd come to him in two weeks' time. It'd be interesting to see what he could do with her help, in the end. Grabbing the supplies he needed in the club, he nodded to Brian as he slammed his door shut behind him. As usual, his old friend wasn't there to greet him. He often forgot the boy was still awake at that time of day. 'Hey, kid,' he said, padding along the quiet hallways in the dark. 'Whatcha up to?' 'I dunno,' the teenager responded, stuffing his hands in his pockets. 'Figured I'd watch the sunset.' 'Cool,' Steve said, stopping by a lamp and turning it on, before starting down the hall. 'You know, I bet I've seen the sunset lots, but I don't remember ever looking at it.' 'Yeah, I've heard that,' the boy responded. He chuckled. 'Probably as much as you've seen grass growing, huh?' 'Probably,' Steve grunted. 'Well, if you're staring at me instead
