The six elements typically include a knot that is tied around a portion of the material. This portion of material is then pulled and the knot is tightened. In all, a surgeon has to attach a suture to the dura mater and close the incision in order to secure the dura mater to the skull. By anchoring the suture to the dura mater, the dura mater is kept from being dislodged. This helps avoid re-rupturing of the dura mater. The suture may be fixed to the skull at the craniotomy using a bone screw. Yet another procedure involves resection of tumor such as a meningioma. In this instance, a large portion of the calvarium needs to be removed. However, it is desirable to ensure that this calvarium is replaced with a pedicle screw-based fixation, as opposed to the more traditional plate-based fixation. Accordingly, a procedure known as “calvarial remodeling” is performed when resecting a calvarium to properly secure the skull. This entails a craniotomy, the removal of an osteotomy flap, and the placement of two screws that extend from the edge of the skull into the spongy bone. The screws are connected to a plate that is anchored to the skull. Thus, this is an example of a natural “anchor” that is inserted into the skull to secure the plate to the skull. There are various risks and complications associated with the use of bone screws to secure a plate to the skull. Often the screws may not be fully tightened or may be tightened unevenly. Moreover, head migration of bone screws can occur when screws are placed in the posterior or retro-sigmoid region of the skull. This “head migration” can result in the screw backfiring out of the hole. The head of the screw may either be fully or partially protrude from the bone. When this occurs, it is necessary to re-do the surgery to correct the problem. Such re-do surgery may be substantially more expensive and complicated than the original surgery.
