The present invention relates generally to structures, such as aircraft or automobiles, having an embedded structural member of composite material, and more specifically to method and apparatus for tying reinforcement members to a composite material structure. Extruded Z-channel and cross-grain pre-preg reinforcement members are used in a number of structural applications, such as aircraft and automotive components. For example, reinforcement members of this type are used for the cockpit floor, the knee bolster, the structural tail, the payload floor, and in the bulkheads. Typically, reinforcement members are attached to a composite material structure in a number of ways, such as with rivets, screws, or with through-holes and flanged, clinched, or welded constructions. In aircraft, these structures are often required to be fatigue and corrosion resistant. The present invention relates to improvements in the attachment of reinforcement members to a composite material structure. A typical aircraft, automobile, or other structure has a plurality of reinforcement members embedded in a composite material structure. The reinforcement members run in a specific direction and are attached along the length of the structure. A through-hole is typically formed in the composite material structure for accepting an attachment mechanism, such as a screw or rivet, so that the reinforcement member may be attached to the composite material structure. The reinforcement member can also be attached to the composite material structure with a specially designed pin or tongue, and/or a fiber-reinforced adhesive. The attachment of reinforcement members to a composite material structure is complicated by the fact that reinforcement members are not all of the same length and typically have varying diameters and thicknesses. Reinforcement members also have varying densities, which cause them to act in different ways. The reinforcement members must therefore be tied or anchored, preferably to a composite material structure at a number of points along their length. Often the reinforcement members are tied to the composite material structure at intervals
