Keygen…The Chicago Police Department is using facial recognition software to scan a database of driver's license photos in search of missing people. The system will scan the CPD's database of driver's licenses to identify and then verify the identities of people seen in surveillance footage of crime scenes, Chicago magazine reported Monday. Police are currently testing it with images from thousands of license photos, the magazine said. "This tool has the ability to scan the images and identify the individual by their photo," Sgt. Paul Bauer, who works in the department's forensic office, told the magazine. "This reduces the manual work for us of making a comparison. Once we identify the image, the value in this tool will be used for follow-up investigations or for crime scene investigative purposes." The technology is similar to mass surveillance software that authorities in China have said they can use to identify and track citizens. Cities in California and Massachusetts have used facial recognition technology in conjunction with license plate readers c6a93da74d
